

June 2012

CONTENTS

In This Issue

- 2 Letter from the Editor
- 4 Contributors to this Edition
- 6 Organisational Renewal
Kgalema Motlanthe
- 12 The Politics and Economics of the Olympics
Michael Prior
- 16 ANC 100 YEARS: A History of Involvement in Education
Graeme Bloch
- 22 'Green Economy' Buzz moves to Rio, leaving Pretoria Confused
Patrick Bond
- 26 Colonialism in the 21st century: The Sovereignty Dispute over the Malvinas Islands
R. Carlos Sersale di Cerisano
- 32 A model 21st century competitor
Andrea Quaye
- 34 The New Colonialism of the UN and the AU in Somalia
Abdi Samatar
- 38 Commemorating Effective Governance: The Bi-Laterals and Multi-Party Negotiations in the 1990s
Sibusiso Vil-Nkomo
- 42 The elimination of Xenophobic attacks: Prospects and Challenges
Lufuno Novondwe
- 50 Providing for the future: South Africa does have enough water if...
Department of Water Affairs
- 52 Imagining governance in a post-liberation struggle context: A Public Administration Perspective
Lucky Mathebula
- 56 Building our urban future: What Urban Future?
Elroy Africa
- 58 Mental Barriers in Palestine
Mats Svensson
- 60 The Hunger for Economic Freedom must be Achieved
Benzi Ka-Soko
- 62 It is the Youth League that gives vibrancy to the ANC
Tembile Ndabeni
- 64 Destroy the Old Order: O.R Tambo (Address to the nation on Radio Freedom, 22 July 1985)
Oliver Tambo
- 68 Creative Lens
Poetry by Keorapetse Kgotsisile and Melissa King
Readers' Forum
- 70 Ruel Khoza missed the bus, by Yonela Diko
The Abolition of Commercial Secrets, by Jerry Semudi

© iStockphoto.com; PictureNET Africa (SA) /
Courtesy of SADET; Fati Moalusi / The New Age

All contributing analysts write in their personal capacity

Elroy Africa grew up in Cape Town and studied for a BSocSc at UCT and later a Masters in Town and Regional Planning (MTRP) at the University of Natal (Durban). He was active in student (AZASO) and community organisations in the 1980s and 1990s. He has worked in the NGO, private and public sectors in South Africa. Over the last 13 years he was in the Department of Cooperative Governance (and its predecessor Departments). His last position was that of Director-General. Presently he is working as an Urban Development and Public Governance Policy Advisor and Consultant, based in Pretoria.

Graeme Bloch is senior researcher at MISTRA (Mapungubwe Institute for Strategic Reflection) and visiting adjunct Professor at University of Witwatersrand Public and Development Management School. He has written and published widely, in particular on education, in both academic and more popular publications. Recent books include Investment Choices for South African Education (ed. with Chisholm, Fleisch and Mabizela: Wits University Press); Education, Growth, Aid and Development (ed. with Chisholm and Fleisch: Hong Kong, 2008). He has just published The Toxic Mix: What is wrong with South Africa's schools and how to fix it (Tafelberg, 2009).

Professor Patrick Bond directs the Centre for Civil Society at the University of KwaZulu-Natal, and recently authored The Politics of Climate Justice: Paralysis Above, Movement Below (UKZN Press) and edited Durban's Climate Gamble (UNISA Press).

Carlos Sersale di Cerisano has been the Argentinian Ambassador to South Africa since January 2006. He holds a MIA from Columbia University in New York and is an economist by training from the University of Buenos Aires. Ambassador di Cerisano is a career diplomat with 30 years of multilateral experience in the areas of cooperation and development, economic and social development as well as environmental and humanitarian issues.

Melissa King has worked as a teacher, lecturer, writer and researcher across different sectors of education and training, including ABET, FET colleges, workplace contexts, skills development, schooling and higher education. She has a BA Hons from the University of Natal, and an HDip Ed and MA in English Literature from UNISA. Her interest in the relationship between language and context finds expression in the Creative Lens section which she and Meg Pahad conceived and have edited together since it began, in November 2009.

Dr FM Lucky Mathebula, a Harvard Business School Alumni holds a Doctor of Administration degree from Pretoria University. He specialised in intergovernmental relations. He has worked as a strategic advisor to a former speaker of the National Assembly and a former Deputy Minister of Economic Development. He also acted as a speech writer for some Ministers and Premiers. At present he is speech advisor to the Minister of Public Service and Administration. As an analyst, group think facilitator and strategist he consults for Madyatshamile Holdings.

Benzi Ka-Soko is an Independent Political Analyst specializing in socio-economic and political commentary. He is the former National Spokesperson and Chief Political Advisor of POPCRU. He has robustly commented and written on a plethora of topical issues which include inter alia, the current economic policy, labour law dynamics, employment law challenges, the Trade Union Movement, BEE vis a vis grinding poverty, the Elites and the masses, Afro-phobia violence and on Socialism. He is currently working as a Political Advisor to the Executive Mayor in the Govan Mbeki Municipality in Secunda, Mpumalanga.

Deputy President Petrus Kgalema Motlanthe has served with distinction the National Union Mineworkers (NUM), COSATU, SACP and the ANC. In the early 70s he was a member of the ANC underground and Umkhonto we Sizwe. In April 1976 after spending 11 months in solitary confinement, Kgalema and his comrades Stan Nkosi and Joseph Mosoeu were charged under the terrorism Act in 1977. Found guilty they were sentenced to ten years which they served in the notorious Robben Island prison. On his release from prison he worked for NUM. He was elected Secretary General of the ANC, 1997-2007. In 2007 he was Elected Deputy President of the ANC. In 2008 he was elected as President of S.A following the resignation of Thabo Mbeki. Following the 2009 election he was appointed as Deputy President of RSA.

Keorapetse William Kgositsile, also known as "Bra Willie" is a South African poet and political activist. After working at a series of odd jobs after high school, he took to writing more seriously, getting a job with the newspaper New Age, where he contributed both reporting and poetry. These early poems, anticipating a lifetime of Kgositsile's work, combine lyricism with an un-muted call to arms. Kgositsile lived in exile in the United States from 1962 until 1975 where he was a central figure among African-American poets, encouraging interest in Africa as well as the practice of poetry as a performance art; he was well known for his readings in New York City jazz clubs. As he once said, "In a situation of oppression, there are no choices beyond didactic writing: either you are a tool of oppression or an instrument of liberation." Kgositsile was inaugurated as South Africa's National Poet Laureate in 2006.

Thembile Cyprian Ndabeni graduated from the University of the Western Cape with BA in History, Sociology and Political Science, an HDipEd and an Honours degree in History. He obtained an M Phil in South African Politics and Political Economy from the Nelson Mandela Metropolitan University. Ndabeni was a History tutor whilst a student at UWC and later became a teacher. With the opening of the Mayibuye Centre, he became the research assistant. He

COLONIALISM IN THE 21ST CENTURY

The Sovereignty Dispute over the Malvinas Islands

After 179 years of illegal occupation of a part of the territory of Argentina, the time has come to find a definitive, just and fair solution, based on UN resolution 2065, to the sovereignty dispute of one of the 16 Non-Self Governing Territories in the world still waiting to be decolonised - and therefore fulfil the mandate of the United Nations as agreed after the Second World War.

By R. Carlos Sersale di Cerisano

The Malvinas Islands were discovered in 1520 by members of Magellan's expedition. They were recorded on European maps under a variety of names, but always remained within the areas under the effective control of the Spanish authorities. Papal bulls and the Treaty of Tordesillas of 1494 were the first instruments reflecting Spanish titles in accordance with the international law of the period. The whole Southern region of the Americas, with its coasts, seas and islands, indisputably remained under Spanish sovereignty through the various treaties signed in the period, such as the "American" Treaty of 1670 between Spain and England.

The Peace of Utrecht, signed in 1713, assured the integrity of Spain's possessions in South America and confirmed its exclusive right to sail in the waters of the South Atlantic. As a signatory of the Utrecht agreements and of later treaties in the eighteenth century ratifying them, England accepted these clauses.

In 1749 Spain received news of a British plan to settle the Malvinas Islands and protested strongly to the Government of Great Britain, which then abandoned the plan. In 1764, it was France which showed an interest in the Malvinas Islands, establishing the settlement of Port Louis in Soledad Island. Spain objected strongly and succeeded in persuading France to recognise Spanish rights to the islands. The French Government ordered evacuation of the settlement and handed it over to the Spanish authorities. Soon after the French settlement, the United Kingdom once again expressed its intention of taking over the islands, this time through a clandestine expedition that arrived in the archipelago and established a fort at a place which they named "Port Egmont" on an island to the west of Gran Malvina. Despite the secrecy of the operation, Spain became aware of it and protested strongly. Not receiving an acceptable response, in 1770 it expelled the settlers. As a result of that act, both countries were on the verge of war, but in 1771 they reached an agreement that consisted of two declarations: a declaration by Spain that would return

Port Egmont to the British, making express reservation concerning Spanish rights to sovereignty over the whole of the Malvinas Islands archipelago; and an acceptance of this declaration in which Great Britain remained silent as to the reservation concerning Spanish rights. As part of the arrangement, it was agreed that the English would withdraw from Port Egmont, which they did in 1774.

From then on, the Spanish authorities based in Puerto Soledad continued exercising their jurisdiction and control over the whole of the archipelago. In 1790, with the signing of the Treaty of San Lorenzo at El Escorial, Great Britain undertook not to establish any settlements on either the eastern or the western coasts of South America or on the adjacent islands already occupied by Spain such as the Malvinas Islands. Spain appointed a succession of 32 governors in the Malvinas Islands up to 1811.

After the May Revolution in 1810, the first Argentine Governments considered the Malvinas Islands to be an integral part of the territory inherited from Spain.

In 1820, Argentine naval officer David Jewett took possession of the Malvinas Islands on behalf of the United Provinces of the River Plate in a public ceremony at Puerto Soledad, which was attended by sealers and whalers of different nationalities, including Americans and British. The news was published in the media in the United States and the United Kingdom (David Jewett, The Times of London, 3 August, 1821). Despite the publicity for the ceremony carried out by the Argentine authority, Great Britain did not stake any claim to the Malvinas Islands either on that occasion or later in the process of recognition of Argentina which ended with the signing of the Treaty of Friendship, Trade and Navigation in 1825.

Argentine Governments took various actions confirming their sovereignty over the islands, including the granting of territorial concessions and the adoption of legislation on fishing resources. As a result, Puerto Soledad grew and its inhabitants worked in stockbreeding, sealing and providing services to the boats that came into port. On 10 June 1829, the Argentine Government created the Political and Military Command of the Malvinas Islands and appointed Luis Vernet to lead it. After remaining silent for over 50 years since the brief episode of Port Egmont, during which time there had been successive uncontested Spanish and Argentine administrations in the Malvinas Islands, in November 1829 the United Kingdom presented a protest against the decree of 10 June of that year. Soon afterwards, on 3 January 1833, a British Royal Navy expelled the Argentine authorities by force for refusing to recognise British authority. The Argentine authorities immediately rejected and protested against this act, which was carried out in peacetime, without prior communication or declaration, by a Government supposedly friendly to the Argentine Republic. Indeed, on 16 January 1833, when the first news of the events in the Malvinas Islands reached Buenos Aires, the Argentine Government demanded explanations from the British Chargé d’Affaires, who was unaware of his country’s actions. A few days later, on 22 January, the Minister of Foreign Affairs presented a formal protest to the British Government official, which was repeated and expanded on numerous occasions by the Argentine representative in London. Argentina’s many statements to the British Government invariably met with a negative response.

“Argentina has information that the recent British military deployment in the Malvinas Islands may well include the dispatch of a nuclear submarine with the capacity to transport nuclear weapons to the South Atlantic.”

The issue remained unsettled and was recognised as such by the British Foreign Secretary in an official communication in 1849. Meanwhile Argentina continued to raise the issue at various levels of government and it became a subject of concern in the Argentine Congress. In 1884, in view of the lack of response to its protests, Argentina proposed that the issue should be submitted to international arbitration, but that proposal was also rejected by the United Kingdom, without any reason being given.

Subsequent Argentine Governments have continued to protest to the United Kingdom, without success, and on every suitable occasion they have made statements and expressed reservations in defense and preservation of Argentine sovereignty over the disputed archipelagos.

The question of the Malvinas Islands in the United Nations

Prior to the establishment of the United Nations, the ‘Question of the Malvinas Islands’, understood as the sovereignty dispute between Argentina and the United Kingdom over the Malvinas Islands, South Georgias Islands and South Sandwich Islands and the surrounding maritime areas, was addressed at the San Francisco Conference, at which the Argentine delegation made a statement of reservation of rights according to which the Argentine Republic in no event accepted that the system could be applied to or over any territories belonging to it, whether they were subject to a claim or dispute, or were in the possession of other States.

On 14 December 1960, the United Nations General Assembly adopted resolution 1514 on the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, which proclaimed “the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations” and set out two fundamental principles that should guide the process of decolonisation: self-determination and territorial integrity.

Paragraph 6 of the resolution states that “any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations". This resolution makes it indisputably clear that the principle of self-determination cannot be applied when the territorial integrity of States is at stake.

Pursuant to resolution 1514, on 16 December 1965, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2065 in which it recognised the existence of a sovereignty dispute between Argentina and the United Kingdom and invited the two countries to negotiate for the purpose of finding a peaceful solution to the dispute.

This resolution contains the essential elements that define the question:

- The Malvinas Islands case is one of the forms of colonialism that must be ended.
- It takes note of the existence of a dispute between the Argentine and British governments.
- The Argentine and British governments are invited to engage in negotiations in order to find a peaceful solution to the problem and report on the outcome of such negotiations to the Special Committee or to the General Assembly.
- For such negotiations, the objectives and provisions of the Charter (including Article 33 related to the obligation of the parties to a dispute of seeking, first of all, a solution by negotiation) and of Resolution 1514 (principle of territorial integrity) must be taken into account, as well as the interests of the population of the Islands (thus setting aside the principle of self-determination).

Soon after the adoption of the above resolution, a process of bilateral negotiation concerning the sovereignty of the Malvinas Islands, South Georgias Islands, South Sandwich Islands and the surrounding maritime areas was initiated. Even though both parties proposed a number of different solutions, they did not succeed in reaching an agreement. In 1973, the United Nations General Assembly declared the need to accelerate the negotiations and through its resolution 3160 urged the two Governments to proceed with them without delay.

In subsequent years, while negotiations concerning the sovereignty dispute continued, special talks were held on practical aspects affecting the well-being of the population of the islands, with Argentina expressing its willingness to take their interests into account. In 1971, as a result of these special talks, the two Governments reached an agreement under the sovereignty formula in order to cooperate on matters relating to regular air and maritime services and postal, telegraphic and telephone communications; while Argentina made a commitment to cooperate on health, education, agricultural and technical matters.

At the same time, a number of solutions were considered, both officially and unofficially, in the negotiations on the sovereignty issue. However, despite these negotiations, the United Kingdom carried out activities under its alleged jurisdiction in connection with exploration of natural resources in the disputed area. The Argentine Government protested and opposed those activities.

Aware of this situation, the United Nations General Assembly in December 1976 adopted resolution 31/49, with very significant content, by 102 votes in favor, 1 against (United Kingdom) and 32 abstentions. This resolution calls upon both parties to the dispute to refrain from adopting decisions that entail the introduction of unilateral modifications to the situation while the Islands are going through the process recommended by Resolutions 2065 and 3160. To this day, the United Kingdom continues to ignore this resolution, as it persists in conducting unilateral activities in the disputed area, mainly in connection with the exploration and exploitation of renewable and non-renewable natural resources, as well as military activities.

The 1982 conflict did not alter the nature of the sovereignty dispute which has still not been resolved. The General Assembly recognised this fact in November 1982, when it adopted resolution 37/9 and made the same statement in its resolutions 38/12, 39/6, 40/21, 41/40, 42/19 and 43/25.

Since 1989, the question of the Malvinas Islands has been discussed every year by the Special Committee on Decolonisation. Every year, this Committee adopts a resolution along the same lines as the relevant resolution of the General Assembly. In addition, within the United Nations, the mandate of the mission of good offices of the Secretary-General has been continued and since 2004 the question of the Malvinas Islands has been on the permanent agenda of the General Assembly. It may be discussed upon prior notification by a member State.

Consular and diplomatic relations between the two countries were restored in October 1989 and February 1990, respectively, after they had reached an understanding on the conditions in which the two countries would consider the sovereignty dispute. The Joint Declaration of Madrid of 1989 and 1990 constitutes recognition by both countries of the existence and content of the sovereignty dispute. However, the question of sovereignty, the central issue of the dispute, has not yet been addressed owing to the refusal of the United Kingdom to resume the negotiations on this issue. The United Kingdom insists on its position, rejecting the many calls from Argentina, the United Nations, the Group of 77 and China, the entire international community, regional organisations (the Organization of American States, the Southern Common Market (MERCOSUR), the Union of South American Nations (UNASUR) and the Community of Latin American and Caribbean States (CELAC)) and the Ibero-American Summits, among other multilateral forums.

The United Kingdom combines its refusal to resume negotiations with its reference to a supposed right of self-determination for the population of the islands, which is not applicable in this case and which has been repeatedly rejected by the United Nations. This is because the UN has understood that a population transferred by the colonial power, such as the population of the Malvinas Islands, does not constitute a people with the right to self-determination, because it is not different from the people of the metropolis.

The current situation

The Argentine Republic is once again compelled to alert the international community, through the principal organs of the United Nations, to the growing British militarisation of the Malvinas Islands, South Georgias Islands and South Sandwich Islands and the surrounding maritime areas, which are part of Argentine national territory and, as they are illegally occupied by the United Kingdom, are the subject of a bilateral sovereignty dispute recognised by the United Nations.

The Argentine Government has repeatedly stressed that this growing British militarisation is contrary to the search for a peaceful settlement to the sovereignty dispute and constitutes an affront to the entire region, creating unnecessary tension in the South Atlantic.

The Argentine Government's concern has recently increased owing to statements made and decisions adopted by the British Government that are clearly provocative in nature and that result in the creation of a situation in the South Atlantic that is desired by neither Argentina nor the region.

The statements made to Parliament by Prime Minister David Cameron on 18 January 2012 cannot be interpreted otherwise, as he referred to the Malvinas Islands military forces and said that he had convened the National Security Council to discuss this issue. This was accompanied by statements from the Minister of State for the Armed Forces at the Ministry of Defence, Nick Harvey, who also addressed Parliament on 16 January 2012, boasting that the Malvinas Islands military base has substantial military resources, including air, sea and ground forces, which can be reinforced, if necessary. On 15 January 2012, the British Foreign Secretary, William Hague, spoke along the same lines when he added a reference to the recent modernisation of the military airport of the islands. On 1 February 2012, Julien Brazier, a member of the Defence Committee of the British House of Commons, described the recent British military deployment as a "very powerful and timely" message to Argentina.

Argentina has information that the recent British military deployment in the Malvinas Islands may well include the dispatch of a nuclear submarine with the capacity to transport nuclear weapons to the South Atlantic. Argentina, as well as other countries of the region acting at its request, has sought information from the United Kingdom regarding the transportation of nuclear weapons to the South Atlantic. The United Kingdom has refused to provide any information that would serve to confirm or deny that fact, which is a serious matter affecting countries with which it seeks to maintain normal diplomatic relations. This situation was denounced by the

“It may be concluded that the groundless defence by the United Kingdom of the self-determination of 2,500 islanders is merely a pretext for establishing a powerful military base to serve its strategic interests in the South Atlantic, with implications for the Antarctic and the Pacific and Indian Oceans.”

Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Argentina, Mr Hector Timerman, at the United Nations in February and most recently at the Presidential Summit on Nuclear Security in Seoul, on 27 March 2012.

In 2003, following press reports of the events, the British Government admitted that vessels carrying nuclear weapons had secretly entered the South Atlantic and that incidents had occurred in connection with the handling of those weapons. The Argentine Government complained of these incidents to the United Nations.

The introduction of nuclear weapons into the South Atlantic is contrary to the Treaty of Tlatelolco, to which Great Britain is a party. Under this treaty, the purpose of which is the military denuclearisation of Latin America, all the South American countries have renounced weapons of mass destruction.

This makes the disputed archipelagos a key component of Britain's strategic scheme – global in both nature and reach – to concentrate its enormous military power and its status as the only nuclear Power in the region; it may be concluded that the groundless defence by the United Kingdom of the self-determination of 2,500 islanders is merely a pretext for establishing a powerful military base to serve its strategic interests in the South Atlantic, with implications for the Antarctic and the Pacific and Indian Oceans.

The tension created by the events referred to above has increased with the arrival in the Malvinas Islands of Prince William, who is second in the line of succession to the British throne, in his capacity as a senior officer of the British Army to perform air and sea exercises. Apart from the political implications of this decision, it is aggravated by the dispatch to the South Atlantic of a state-of-the-art missile destroyer of the same kind as the one recently sent by the United Kingdom to the Persian Gulf, a highly volatile area that cannot be compared to the South Atlantic.

What is happening today is a new phase in the growing British military presence in the disputed area. In 2004, the British Government upgraded the military base in the Malvinas Islands, enlarging its scope of operations to areas beyond the disputed area. Furthermore, in 2010 the Argentine Republic complained to the International Maritime Organization about British missile exercises being conducted in maritime areas near the Malvinas Islands which jeopardised the safety of navigation in the South-West Atlantic.

At the same time, the new British Strategic Defence and Security Review released in October 2010 indicates the true strategic goal of the military base established in the Malvinas Islands: to provide a support centre for British military deployment on a global scale. It goes without saying that this goal is alien to the interests of the region.

The British military escalation is of concern not only to Argentina but also to the countries of the region and beyond. The Ibero-American Summits held in December 2010 and October 2011, and the Union of South American Nations (UNASUR) meeting held in October 2011, joined Argentina in rejecting the British military deployment in the area.

This situation is occurring in the context of the United Kingdom's repeated refusal to resume the negotiations urged by the United Nations and of its illegal unilateral measures involving the exploration and exploitation of renewable and non-renewable natural resources in the disputed area. This openly violates the provisions of United Nations General Assembly resolution 31/49, which requires both parties to refrain from taking decisions that would imply introducing unilateral modifications in the situation in the islands while the sovereignty dispute between the two countries remains unresolved.

The illegitimate oil exploration activities which the United Kingdom has conducted – and, since 2010, expanded – in waters adjacent to the Malvinas Islands are not only contrary to the above-mentioned resolution 31/49, but are being carried out in the difficult conditions of the South Atlantic in a previously pristine marine environment. These activities are also a source of particular concern for Argentina as they imply a serious environmental risk which could lead to an ecological disaster such as the one that recently occurred in the Gulf of Mexico.

Such illegal activities have been rejected by the Southern Common Market (MERCOSUR) and its associated States, UNASUR and the Community of Latin American and Caribbean States (CELAC). In order to foresee or prevent such activities, MERCOSUR and UNASUR have undertaken to inform the Argentine Republic of the movement of ships with cargo related to oil exploration and exploitation in areas occupied by the United Kingdom. The last ministerial declaration adopted by the Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs of UNASUR was adopted in Paraguay on 17 March, 2012.

At inter-regional level, between South American and Sub-Saharan countries there are two important statements approved at the highest level: in the Luanda Final Declaration of the 6th Meeting of Member States of the Zone of Peace and Cooperation of the South Atlantic (2007); and the Declaration of Nueva Esparta, Isla Margarita, Venezuela, at the 2nd Africa-South America Summit (26-27 September, 2009). These documents called for the resumption of negotiation between the two governments "to find as soon as possible a peaceful, just and durable solution to the sovereignty dispute."

In view of the above, the United Kingdom's conduct in relation to the sovereignty dispute is incompatible with its obligations as a United Nations Member State regarding the peaceful settlement of international disputes pursuant to the provisions of the Charter. This is particularly serious in view of its status as a permanent member of the Security Council, the body responsible for safeguarding international peace and security.

Even more serious is the fact that, at a time when the world is discussing the need to avert a nuclear configuration, a permanent member of the Security Council is sending a contradictory message. The growing British militarisation of the Malvinas Islands certainly does not contribute to peace and security in the South Atlantic in particular and to the world in general.¹ There is no doubt that what is at stake is the exploitation of natural resources: oil, fisheries and minerals².

In the case of oil, it is estimated that the basins around the islands contains 12 billion barrels of reserves. The companies illegally working in the area estimate to extract oil in 2016, which would eventually generate US$ 177bn in taxes and an income to the British inhabitants of the islands of US$ 3,2 million each year (without doing any investment) (Dominic O'Connell, The Times, England, 22 February, 2012).

Taking this situation into account, the Argentine government has denounced these hydrocarbon exploration and exploitation activities as illegal and, consequently, will take legal action against the companies which are directly or indirectly involved in the oil industry in the Argentine continental shelf in proximity to the Malvinas Islands.

In the case of illegal British fishing activity in the disputed area, the situation has also been aggravated by the United Kingdom's unilateral granting of property rights over fishing resources to third parties for a period of up to 25 years, thus creating a fait accompli which once again highlights the British refusal to settle the dispute through bilateral negotiations. According to estimates the illegal fishing around the islands generates US$ 1,600 billion for the licensed companies and US$ 200 million for the inhabitants of the Malvinas.

In this context, and after 179 years of illegal occupation of a part of the territory of Argentina, the time has come to find a definitive, just and fair solution, based on UN resolution 2065, to the sovereignty dispute of one of the 16 Non Self-Governing Territories in the world still waiting to be decolonised – and therefore fulfil the mandate of the United Nations as was agreed after the Second World War.

As an example of our commitment to this issue, Argentine President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner will participate in the forthcoming session of the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation, where the question of the Malvinas Islands will be considered. At that forum, the President will reiterate our willingness to resume the long-postponed negotiations in order to reach a peaceful solution to the sovereignty dispute. This is the intention of the democratic government of Argentina, which will continue pursuing the full exercise of sovereignty, taking into account the lifestyle and interests of the inhabitants of the Islands and in accordance with the principles of International Law. ■

References:

1. See the military capacity of the nuclear submarine "Vanguard" which is able to store nuclear weapons; of the Eurofighters "Typhoon" with missiles Taurus and of the war ship "HMS Dauntless", armaments that has been deployed in conflict areas such as Libya, Iraq and Afghanistan.
2. See the Shackleton Report published in 1977 in which identifies the potential of those resources although the exploitation was not commercial viable at that time.